

Butterflies is a tour-de-force of the millennial mind. The first of a new genre of fiction - classed as informed fiction - Butterflies blends hard reporting and real-life events and persons with fictional characters and accounts of fraud, infidelity and moral complexity. Butterflies - so called because of the metamorphosis that society is undergoing culturally, globally, spiritually and technologically takes you to an uncomfortable but compelling and well-reasoned place wherein you will discover a whole new way of seeing the world (or at least discover the way that many of today's members of society who are up-and-coming see it). The author constantly pushes to the very limit the conventional laws of narration and thinking in order to break new discoveries and crack long-unanswered questions such as how the economic structure of our world relates to our physical lives as well as our thoughts, dreams and fantasies, and in turn finds fault with the very individuals whose word too often goes unquestioned.
